Belleville Divorce - In divorce proceedings, property rights are decided by Part 1 and Part II of the Family Law Act. The value of the house itself and the way it is divided is particularly dealt with by Part II, whilst Part I handles the rest of the property. Only people who have entered into a lawful marriage are entitled to take advantage of these laws. Couples of the same sex who are officially married are likewise part of this particular grouping.

Property which has been accrued throughout the marriage is the only property which is eligible to be divided. "Equalization" is the method that is used to be able to divide the values evenly amongst the spouses. During this process, the value for each and every individual's net family property is calculated. The spouse with the lower net family property value gets half of the difference between their net family properties.

In this situation, the word "property" refers to anything bought by the individual in addition to all the registered objects. In the case where something is registered under both spouse's names, the value is divided evenly between the two.

In order to decide who receives the furniture and kitchen appliances, it is normally up to the spouses. To have to lawyers determine who should get what will cost much more than the value of the furniture itself.
